WILL' IT WORK?

BOBBY Willis, the man behind bringing rounds of the European Rally Championship (ERC) to Ireland, is now on the cusp of getting a round of the World Rally Championship back to our shores in 2022.

demarc, we had to pull the plug on any thoughts of running in 2021 we were hoping for it to be possible in August this year," said Willis.

Working The North will host the Newry-based Ulster Rally in November, with the event being the final round of the 2021 British series. Willis has been working with the Stormont executive on his WRC dream and a few years ago he persuaded a delegation to go to Spain to see what was involved in running and says a WRC round would "showcase Ireland, highlighting our incredible scenery to millions of homes around the world. "It has been a difficult time recently in terms of the coronavirus and the challenges surrounding Brexit, so our community, whether they have an interest in motorsport or not, I think needs something to look forward to.

Achieve "I wouldn't be putting in this work if I didn't think we could achieve it and I really do believe this is possible." Willis continues to engage closely with the North's departments for the Economy and Tourism in an attempt to ring-fence the money needed to bring the WRC to Belfast, which would be its base.

He remains confident a deal can be brokered for 2022, despite not making it onto a list of nine countries recently agreed by the FIA's World Motor Sport Council and at present four spaces remain on the WRC's 13-round schedule for next year.

"Discussions are underway to consider the feasibility of hosting an event in future years, but this would be subject to the event representing value for money, and the Executive being prepared to make the necessary funding available," said a spokesperson for Tourism Northern Ireland.

Willis was the driving force behind the running of three ERC rounds in the North, from 2014 to 2016. There were suggestions that Willis was in a position to host a WRC round in 2021 as last year's Wales Rally GB was cancelled altogether and was not included in the current calendar.

However, with Covid restrictions unlikely to be brought down to the levels needed to run a rally here in the next few months, attention has switched to 2022. "For obvious reasons with the whole pan-
