

Facilities for female jockeys are just not fit for purpose

SCRUTINY on horseracing and in particular Britain's weighing room culture has never been greater because of the allegations of bullying made by Bryony Frost against fellow jump jockey Robbie Dunne.

Frost's allegations have also put the sport on trial.

Let me state now, some of the weighing-room facilities and the situations they create, especially for young female jockeys entering the sport, are not fit for purpose. That rings true irrespective of the outcome of the Frost-Dunne case.

I am not alone in being uncomfortable about how the British Horseracing Authority have handled the investigation into Frost's complaints.

They seem to have lost control of the case, with leaked documents appearing in a Sunday newspaper and the unexplained departure of an employee who conducted the investigation. It has also taken far too long to bring this case to a conclusion.

There has been speculation about weighing-room culture and accusations of a code of silence among jockeys when they are asked about the case.

Lizzie Kelly

All complaints must be thoroughly investigated, although a situation where bullying is routinely allowed and even condoned in the weighing room is not something I recognise.

But the physical layout of many weighing rooms can lead a young female jockey into potentially uncomfortable situations. That is a massive issue and needs to be addressed urgently.

For context, you need to understand how weighing rooms work. Some were designed when jockeys were all men.

Male and female jockeys have separate changing areas. There may be communal zones, a tea room and TVs to watch the racing. Valets are employed and paid by riders to wash their kit and look after their equipment.

The valets are all male and are based in the men's changing room. That means female jockeys have to go into the male changing room to do their job.

Bizarre as it may seem, there are positives in this for female jockeys. A race starts in the weighing room. That is where the jockeys discuss what is going to happen in the next race — who intends going out front or hold up their mounts. How mounts jump and which horses are keen and pull hard early in a race.

Those are just a few tactical things that help as you prepare and start to focus on getting the spot you want down at the start. It would be a negative to be excluded from that chat.

Let's not pretend this is not intimidating, especially at the start of the career of a female jockey, maybe still in her teens.

In the ladies' changing room, we used to make a joke of going into the men's changing room, especially with newer jockeys, so that they felt more at ease.

It can also be overwhelming when you are surrounded by people you admire, because of what they have achieved within the sport. But as a group, we would laugh with one another that those individuals weren't so scary once you'd seen a few bare bottoms!

That situation will really surprise some. The world is changing and that is not acceptable now.

I had my last ride in the 2019-20 season and it feels like even my experiences will soon be categorised as stories from 'the good old days'. It's hard to think of any other sport in which they would accept such a scenario.

The BHA have to be stronger in pressing racecourses to improve their facilities for all jockeys, but especially for female riders.

Too many racecourses have not committed to improving standards in the weighing rooms for the increasing number of female riders.

The facilities aren't just substandard, they are outrageously unsatisfactory.
