

Fury as athletes forced to race in the brutal cold

IF international revulsion towards our hosts was the preamble to these Winter Olympics, then organisational chaos is the theme now the Games have begun.

Yesterday, the sources of anger towards Beijing 2022 were varied and widely distributed, spanning safety complaints about the extreme cold from the Swedes, fury and fear from the Russians and Poles over the quarantine hotels and German food gripes.

Completing the chorus, the Finnish said the isolation facilities endured by one of their ice hockey players breached his human rights.

Presumably, it is hard to pull off a sportswashing drill when so much dirt keeps dropping into the sink.

The illustration of the Swedes' concern was delivered by their medal hope Frida Karlsson, trembling and close to collapse in the wake of finishing fifth in the 15km skiathlon in Zhangjiakou mountains on Saturday evening.

With the temperature reported as -24 C with the wind chill, the Swedish team boss Anders Bystroem was yesterday weighing up a plea to organisers to stage events earlier in the day for the sake of athlete safety.

He said: 'The women's skiathlon competition started at 4pm and Frida Karlsson was completely destroyed by the cold. We have talked about making a request (to race earlier) during the day if it's possible.' Team Ireland kicked off yesterday with Thom Maloney Westgaard finishing 43rd in the 15km + 15km Skiathlon.

The Men's Downhill event Alpine Skiing, that was meant to take place earlier in the day, was rescheduled until today due to strong winds. This means Jac Gower will now compete tomorrow at 4am Irish time.
