

Gower powers to 12th in Alpine event

ALPINE skier Jack Gower was nearly lost for words after he recorded Ireland's second-best Winter Olympic result by finishing 12th in yesterday's combined event at the Beijing Games.

Gower, who has roots in Skibbereen and West Cork, was competing in his first Olympics and started the day with a strong display to finish 14th in the downhill before going two places better in the slalom, finishing with an overall time of 2:37:34, recording an Irish Winter Olympic result that has only been bettered by Clifton Wrottesley's fourth place in the skeleton back in 2002.

'Twelfth at the Olympics, I mean that's crazy,' Gower said. 'There are 30,000 competitors in alpine skiing, so to get 12th is ... what can I say, it is great.'

Athletes compete in both the downhill speed event and the more technical slalom in alpine combined. Normally a downhill specialist, Gower delivered a clean run in the challenging slalom course, finishing in a time of 52:58, placing him well inside his goal of top-15 placing.

'As an athlete, you always want a little more,' said Gower, a former world junior champion. 'In the downhill, I had some really good sections and some slower sections. But at the same time, 12th in the Olympics in such a competitive sport is huge.'

Gower finished six minutes and 30 seconds behind gold medalist, Austria's Johannes Strolz.

Tess Arbez competed in her final race of Beijing 2022 earlier this morning with the super-G event while cross-country skier

Thomas Maloney Westgaard will compete in his preferred event today, the cross-country 15km classic.

Skating at the Games remains embroiled in controversy with reports that a member of the Russian team, who claimed gold on Monday, had recorded a positive doping test.

The International Olympic Committee have refused to comment on rumours the unnamed athlete is 15-year-old Kamila Valieva, who captured attention earlier in the week by becoming the first female to perform a quadruple at the Olympics.

Delight: Ireland's Jack Gower was thrilled with his display
