At Roland Garros

RAFAEL NADAL and Novak Djokovic had not been finished many hours when French Open tournament director Amelie Mauresmo addressed the elephant in the room.

In the wake of their early hours drama, she was asked why men had been selected to play nine out of the 10 matches in the new night session at Roland Garros.

Her reply was surprisingly frank: 'In this era that we are in right now, I don't feel — and as a woman, a former woman's player, I don't feel bad or unfair saying — that right now you have more attraction, can you say that, appeal? That's the general (ity), for the men's matches,' she said.

Nadal versus Djokovic was an extreme example of her point and they put on a superb show for those who stayed on until its 1.15am finish in frigid temperatures.

This was no ordinary match-up and it was no surprise that host daytime broadcasters France TV were furious it was the one contest given to Amazon Prime.

Nonetheless the words of the

Marathon man Rafa

He says he's struggling for fitness but nobody can rule out title No 14

2006 Wimbledon women's champion will be bruising to the WTA Tour, even if its players will be happy to have escaped the conditions that have accompanied these late night offerings.

Nadal will now meet Alex Zverev in tomorrow's semi-finals after yet another physical revival. Less than three weeks after almost limping out of the Italian Open, the Spaniard has not missed the chance to talk down his chances in Paris due to a recurrence of the bone problems in his left foot.

Nobody is more skilled at playing down expectations than Nadal, only to appear at the end of the tournament holding the trophy.

Djokovic has been around too long to be anything other than sceptical. Asked whether his physical level over a four-hour, 12-minute encounter came as a shock he said: 'I'm not surprised at all. It's not the first time he is able to, a few days after he's injured and barely walking, come out 100 per cent physically fit. He's done it many times.'

Another miracle: Nadal ignored injury to beat Djokovic REX

'I mean, I have what I have there in the foot, so if we are not able to find an improvement or a small solution on that, then it's becoming super difficult for me.'

Iga Swiatek recorded her 33rd straight victory to keep on track for a second French Open title. The 21 year-old Pole will face Russia's Daria Kasatkina in today's semi-finals after beating American Jessica Pegula 6-3 6-2.

Coco Gauff will attempt to reach her first Grand Slam final aged just 18 when she plays world No 59 Martina Trevisan of Italy.
