RUGBY FARRELL

IRELAND gloriously, deservedly, defeated the All Blacks at the Aviva last November, posting a three-tries-to-two, 29-20 victory.

Seven months later though, it is not as easy to be cheerful as Ireland head for the land of the long white cloud.

A Leinster-based front-row has suffered opposite English, French and South African opposition; the second-row looks jaded; the back-row seems to be, physically, too small.

Johnny Sexton turns 37 mid-tour and there doesn't seem anyone to lighten his load; the centres don't have an obvious in-form partnership; full-back Hugo Keenan looked out-of-sorts at season's end.

End of Season Report concerns include: Leinster's pack being out-muscled in May; Ulster looking exhausted since March, Munster appearing completely demoralised; and Connacht not good enough to claim a Heineken Cup spot for next season.

Moreover, taken cumulatively, these factors leave real fears that 40 players is nowhere near enough to get through five physical games in 18 days.

Yet, and yes, Andy Farrell has talked of wanting his players to face adversity, to show character. Clive Woodward subsequently claimed England's seven 1998 defeats (Australia, New Zealand 'A', New Zealand Academy, All Blacks twice, NZ Maori and South Africa) were building blocks for their 2003 Rugby World Cup win.

The then rookie England coach surmised he learned more about himself and his players in crisis mode and under pressure than he could have elsewhere.

Building Thus Farrell takes this small band to New Zealand - where they open against the Maori All Blacks this Wednesday morning - looking for victories for sure but also for character building.

If there is a line between leveraging ambition, big results and momentum against the threat of lost confidence, losses and doubts, then the Ireland coach is threading a very fine one.

Because last November's rosy picture has been altered by results in a results orientated business.

Ireland looked a million dollars seven months back, their tactics - with some deft nuances - shone through as Farrell looked to have answered almost every rugby question imaginable.

Andrew Porter had made a highly successful switch to loose-head; Tadhg Furlong was terrific at tight-head; newbie hooker Ronan Kelleher looked the part, a first since Rory Best's retirement.

Caelan Doris, playing at no 6, showed the Irish fans what Farrell had put massive faith in; he scored a magnificent try, picked up man of the match, was Ireland's top tackler with 12 hits, made 12 carries for 58m.

Iain Henderson and James Ryan were powerhouses in the second-row; Josh van der Flier was setting off on his best season ever; Tadhg Beirne and Peter O'Mahony put in outstanding cameos from the bench.

Then came the news New Zealand Rugby wanted to change Ireland's tour from three to five, adding two games against the Maori All Blacks, and it seemed like opportunity knocking.

Ireland, notwithstanding those who had beaten the All Blacks, would be able to bring an extended squad on tour with NZR picking up the tab.

This would surely shape the 2023 Rugby World Cup squad, identify who the 10/12 'extra' players should be and give them game time between now and then.

And then ... crisis, carnage and confidence worries. Leinster's front-row and pack started getting turned over as England and France did a number on them internationally.

Fears Leinster were underpowered as evidenced against Saracens 2019, 2020 and La Rochelle 2021 were intensified when La Rochelle and Bulls both did a 2022 number on them.
