

Painful to watch as the end looks nigh for warrior Murray

WHEN Andy Murray starts to question his work ethic you know something is awry. Whatever else, etched deep into his career has been a monastic dedication to his craft. It has allowed him to go where no singles player has gone before, playing with a large lump of metal in the hip. Yet in the wake of a sobering defeat at the Paris Masters on Monday night to 37-year-old Frenchman Gilles Simon — who is about to retire — a dejected Murray castigated himself in unprecedented terms, admitting that he had not been in the gym enough. His problem against Simon was the return of cramping issues halfway through the second set, which saw him blow a 6-4, 5-3 lead and lose 6-3 in the decider. 'Having that happen after a set and a half on an indoor court, where it's not particularly hot, is not really acceptable,' the Scot said. 'There's no guarantee that I win that match but, when you lose matches, and it feels like it's down to your physicality, it's really, really disappointing. 'It's nothing to do with my hip. I think just the reality is I need to work harder. Obviously, there's certain things I can and can't do nowadays. I need to be a bit more careful with some of the training that I do. But I can certainly do more than what I have done and push myself harder than what I have done recently. What I'm trying to do is extremely hard. 'I need to do exceptional things to still compete. If I'm being completely honest, I don't think the last four or five months that that's necessarily been happening, since the issue sort of started in Newport,

By MIKE DICKSON

Washington time (immediately post-Wimbledon),' he said, later adding that he had barely done two proper gym sessions since New York. 'Usually I would dedicate more time to my training. You know, like training blocks in hot climates and things like that. So it's something that I'll have to look at.' Six years ago, at this same venue of Bercy in the east of Paris, Murray (right) won this title to become world No 1. Adding insult to injury on Monday was the lack of respect from a raucous crowd, supporting the outgoing Simon with continual shouts on Murray's serve and applause for his double faults. It was painful to watch this outstanding warrior-athlete in a reduced state, rushing between points and swishing as much in hope as expectation. Even someone with his levels of determination must wonder if it is all worth it. Murray stated that cramping issues have dogged him for four months. Only he can know, but it is plausible that tension and nerves may be another factor.

'I've not really done much since the US Open (in September), like, physically in the gym, or anything, very, very little,' he said. 'I'm probably conditioned in some ways for tennis, because my body is responding well to the matches.

'I know I'll wake up tomorrow and feel OK. But from an endurance perspective, that's something I pride myself on, being there right to the end.'

Murray, 35, will now return home and then plans a three-week trip to Florida to team up with mentor Ivan Lendl. But you wonder how many more seasons there will be for the double Wimbledon champion.
